With Hillary running for US president and Beyonce running the world, there's no doubt that women and feminism have come a long way already. Yet, the road is long and the struggle is real, as different women experience different forms of oppression: as wives, as mothers, as celibates, as refugees, as consumers, as coloured women, as religious women, and so on, and so forth.

It's these differences that this year's Feminist Film Festival seeks to celebrate and address. With over nineteen films and four panel discussions to choose from, there's bound to be something that sparks your curiosity. 'A Place of Rage' looks at the role of Black women in shaping modern day feminism, 'Sets Her Free' gives a voice to female refugees, 'They Call Us Maids' exposes the realities of modern day slavery and 'What Happened to Her' delves into why the fuck female film characters are always killed off.
